colony of British Guiana. It was hoped that the Dutch and the English in Cape Colony would live together in friendly intercourse, and that eventually by intermarriage a fusion of the two races would be effected. This hope was doomed to disappointment, for an antagonism gradually developed between the old and the new colonists which led to the establishmen; of two republics beyond the border of the Colony. The first step toward the formation of these republics was the emigration, during 1836 and 1837, of about eight thousand Dutch farmers from the Cape Colony, a movement which is generally referred to as the Great Trek.
